Disturbances and de/growth utopias

Disturbances seems to be rather usual state of landscapes modifying environs and generating also particular affordances in longer perspective. Change of social and economic settings push to reconsider growth perspectives and utopias as current conditions of (urban) reality. Borders, technologies and categorisations become involved in these dynamics in various ways. The current paper tries to de-territorialise the border-city locus by focusing on diverse stories of disturbance and de/growth in Narva context.
